

IN MEMORIAM

EDITED BY CAMERON M. BURNS

ANN BROOKS CARTER, 1917–2011

Ann Brooks Carter was born into a loving Quaker family in Medford, Massachusetts, on February 10, 1917. After graduation from Smith College in 1938, she taught at the Shady Hill School in Cambridge, which she had attended. In 1942 Ann married H. Adams Carter, former editor of this journal, in whose “steps she trod” for 53 years, joining him on climbs and expeditions from New Hampshire’s White Mountains to Peru, Asia, and Eastern and Western Europe.

Ann and Ad Carter in the 1940s.

They attended both the wedding and the coronation of the King of Nepal, whom they had hosted in their home in Jefferson, New Hampshire, while he was studying at Harvard in 1967. In 1974 they trekked with another couple to the base of K2. Two years later Ann spent a month at a Ghandi Ashram in the foothills while Ad was on expedition. In 1988, at the invitation of the Chinese Mountaineering Federation, they became the first foreigners since the Revolution to be allowed into the Tibetan Plateau region of Yunnan Province, this in connection with a joint Chinese-American expedition. And in 1993 they joined Queen Elizabeth, to celebrate the 40th Anniversary of the first ascent of Mt. Everest.

Although Ad was the AAJ’s official editor, Ann spent almost as many hours as he did editing text and reading galley proofs. In 1994 she was honored with the AAC’s Angelo Heilprin Citation for this work. The side benefit for them was that they seemed to always have a place to stay with a fellow mountaineer during their world travels.

During WWII Ann and Ad were based in Washington, DC, but they both spent substantial time on Mt. Washington in the winter, testing and developing mountaineering equipment for the 10th Mountain Division. Following the war they moved to Chile for nine months, before settling for 58 years in Milton, Massachusetts. There Ad taught foreign languages, while Ann was a community volunteer and surrogate parent to countless boarding and foreign students. She was famous for her afternoon teas and ever-open heart.

Some of Ann’s favorite times were spent in Jefferson, where she hosted AAC meetings, climbers, and friends, which she continued to do even after Ad’s death in 1995. Last summer, at age 94, she was still sailing her beloved 1913 Catboat and swimming in Pleasant Bay.

Untroubled by the constraints of age, Ann was always willing to try something new. On last Columbus Day weekend, a few days before she was diagnosed with colon cancer, she was in Jefferson. Her son Peter called and said, “If you can get over here this afternoon, let’s go up in a balloon.” That afternoon they were floating a mile above the mountains of Vermont. “That was pretty typical of her,” Peter recalled. “Instead of saying, ‘Are you crazy?’ she climbed right in, and up we went.” Parts of this obituary appeared in The Boston Globe and The Valley News.

STEVE HACKETT, 1945–2011

Steve Hackett. Tam Agosti-Gisler

The Kachemak Nordic Ski Club and the community of Homer lost a valuable member when Steve Hackett, 65, passed away while skiing at Arctic Valley on February 26. He had been at a PSIA ski instructors workshop on a blue cold day. After completing the workshop on the last run of the day, he collapsed and passed on due to natural causes.

Steve's father had been a national park ranger, which allowed Steve to spend his childhood in the freedom of the parks of Wyoming, Montana, and Colorado, from which grew his lifelong passion for wilderness and outdoor adventure. In 1968 he graduated from the Colorado School of Mines in Golden, Colorado, with a degree in Geophysical Engineering. Shortly thereafter he moved to Alaska, where in 1977 he obtained a Masters in Geology and Geophysics from UAF. Steve's professional career was as varied as the mountains he loved. In addition to being a geologist, he worked as a trail-crew foreman in Rocky Mountain National Park, a mountaineering guide on Denali, a backcountry ranger in Denali National Park, an avalanche specialist for the Department of Transportation, an avalanche-safety instructor, a ski patrolman, a math and science teacher in rural Alaska, and a home school contact teacher for Interior Distance Education of Alaska in Soldotna. While working for the Cook Inletkeeper, he helped create the state's first agency-approved, citizen-based, water-quality monitoring program.

Steve met his wife Ann on the Ruth Glacier, where he maintained a base camp and dog-sledding service. It might have been the rarified air, but their heads were soon spinning, and they married in 1987. They worked together as teachers in Russian Mission and Seldovia and then settled on their small homestead at the head of Kachemak Bay.

He made numerous first ascents in Alaska, ascents of Denali, and took part in expeditions at home and abroad. Among his favorites were a 1972 trip to Nepal with his brother Jim, a joint Soviet expedition to the Pamirs in what is now Tajikistan, an adventurous 1974 river trip from Lake Chakachamna to Anchorage, via the Skwentna, Yetna, and Susitna Rivers, a 1976 solo ascent of Mt. Igikpak in the Brooks Range, and a 1980 ski traverse of the Bagley Icefield from Miles Lake to Yakutat. His company, Alaska Treks and Voyages, out of Moose Pass, guided remote wilderness dog-pack and river trips and sea kayaking trips in Kenai Fjords National Park.

Steve volunteered for many organizations, including the Mountaineering Club of Alaska, Alaska Backcountry Guides Cooperative, Alaska Natural History Association, Alaska Natural Resource and Outdoor Education Association, Cook Inlet Regional Citizens Advisory Council, and the Alaska Quiet Rights Coalition.

Steve will be dearly missed for his infectious enthusiasm, his generosity, his radiant smile, his perseverance in the face of all obstacles, his dedication to teaching, and his gentle spirit.
